

Hello Friends, Students and Colleagues,

Normally I would send out the link to my latest essay or article with a newsletter complete with sustainability information, job opportunities etc. However, I've been tied up team-writing (a very worthwhile) grant this week to engage Latinas in learning about native plants as a vehicle toward a more functional, beautiful landscape as well as an enhanced career path for each of them! We're very hopeful about what the outcomes may be for the project here in the Heart of America. However, with a book review due as well (a big, hairy science-y, research-y kind of thing), I'm simply going to send you this link to the essay I wrote for those wonderful folks at the Center for Human's and Nature which was published this week.

The short essay is not only a reflection on useful ways we might work with each other and our cities to develop more sustainably (or keep trying anyway). . . it was also a way for me to whump away at the head and shoulders of the universe without hurting anyone in my proximity.

Per usual, if you are reading this you are either on my newsletter list or I just thought you might be interested. If you're not and you want off this list, just give me a holler. (Oh, and if you'd like to be on the newsletter list I'd be happy to have you! Give a holler in that case too.) In either case, I hope you're having a glorious Friday!

Can't never could,

Margo

Margo Farnsworth

Screendoor Consulting

Screendoorconsulting.com

615.478.4889

Contributing author in Wildness: Relations of People and Place